

Thinking Colour Symposium (Oxford, 24 Jun 16)

University of Oxford, Trinity College, Danson Room, Broad Street, Oxford, OX1 3BH, Jun 24, 2016

Lucy Whelan

Thinking Colour is an interdisciplinary symposium bringing together academics, curators and artists to consider the philosophical relations between colour and thinking. Engaging with questions of colour in ways that exceed the discussion of specific cases and linguistic manifestations, it approaches colour through visual analysis, visual theory, critical thought, and comparative or transhistorical reflection. It asks questions such as: how do images think in/through colour? What is colour's affective power? How does colour relate to specific materialities? How can colour have agency? Is colour a device for – or even a form of – thinking? How can colour function in relation to thinking in artistic practice/research?

The day will consist of several talks delivered by invited international academics who are leading in this field. We are honoured to host Eric Alliez (Kingston University), David Batchelor (Royal College of Art), Laure Blanc-Benon (University Paris-Sorbonne), Natasha Eaton (University College London), Liz Watkins (University of Leeds), Paul Smith (University of Warwick), among other speakers.
