Art History and Socialism(s) after World War II: The 1940s until the 1960s

Conference on art historical writing during the early Soviet era

on 27th-29th October 2016

at Estonian Academy of Sciences main hall (Kohtu 6, Tallinn).

The research team of the Institute of Art History and Visual Culture at the Estonian Academy of Arts "Historicizing art: Knowledge production in art history in Estonia amidst changing ideologies and disciplinary developments" is organising an international conference "Art History and Socialism(s) after World War II: The 1940s until the 1960s" from 27th to 29th October 2016. The conference will take place at the Estonian Academy of Sciences main hall (Kohtu 6, Tallinn).

Although the Soviet and Eastern European socialist regimes of the latter 20th century seem to lie in the distant past now, research on them still has many uncovered areas. This applies not least to the role of "socialist" art historians, their activities and functions in universities, exhibitions and the mass media, and especially their academic text production. Deriving from a complicated socio-cultural set of relations, the common denominator for which was "socialism", these art historical "acts" shaped the general comprehensions of art, culture and history in the society at large. With the overall historiographical turn in the humanities, scholars from the Baltic to the Balkan region have begun to re-address the various histories of artworks, architecture, artistic styles and whole epochs that these practices constructed. Conferences on this recent art historical past have been held and scholarly publications issued, including in English, today's lingua franca, but the vast majority of research remains only in native languages, thus circulating mainly at the local level.

The conference offers the researchers of socialist art history a common platform to introduce and compare art historical practices across the former Soviet Union and the socialist countries of Europe. Paraphrasing the late Piotr Piotrowski, the time is ripe for the project of a "horizontal" reading of socialist art history. As with different "socialisms", "socialist art history" as an umbrella term covers a variety of ways of writing the history of art and architecture. Moscow's influence varied greatly depending on the decade, region and particular situation. In addition to ideological pressure and terror, other factors - of which neighbours might not have been or still might not be aware - affected the art historical ideas and practices of different Soviet republics and the satellite states in Eastern and Central Europe. The making of art history and its visual displays by means of exhibitions (as well as contemporary artistic practices) also depended on the international art history discourse, even though the range and accessibility of literature etc. varied from country to country.

The post-World War II socialism and related art historical discourse had many faces: too many for a single conference. Therefore we have launched a series of conferences, the first of which will be held in Tallinn in October 2016, focusing on the decades immediately following the war. In 2017 and 2018 follow-up conferences will be held in Leipzig and Berlin.

This English-language conference comprises speakers from all over Europe, Russia and America. The programme includes both historiographical and theoretical accounts on the periodisation and writing of the history of art and architecture in the former Soviet Union and its satellite states.

Participation in the conference is free of charge. Registration closes on 20th October 2016.
