

Dutch painters in Rome: between Caravaggism and the market (Rome, 28 Apr 17)

Rome, Royal Netherlands Institute, Apr 28, 2017

Arnold Witte

Dutch painters came to Rome in the sixteenth century for various reasons; they wanted to perfect their artistic education by studying classical antiquity and the modern masters such as Raphael and Michelangelo. By the beginning of the seventeenth century, they still came to the Eternal City but several aspects had radically changed. First of all, quite a few remained longer than necessary for a mere study trip – they sometimes settled here for years. They also started to develop a style of painting that had nothing to do with classical antiquity – either opting for Caravaggio, or developing the so-called Bambocciate or genre-pieces that were in great demand with local patrons and buyers, but which became frowned upon by 19th century historians of Dutch art. During this round-table, various speakers will approach the phenomenon from art historical, social and historical perspectives.

The conference starts at 16:00 and will consist of the following talks:

Reflections on recent (mis)attributions to Caravaggio - Gert Jan van der Sman, Dutch University Institute for Art History in Florence

Painters from the North and the Art Market in Early Seventeenth-century Rome - Patrizia Cavazzini, Research Fellow British School at Rome

Changing tastes. The formal and informal appreciation of the works of 17th century Dutch painters from the 19th to the 21st century - Paul Schnabel, Utrecht University

Free entry - see for more info <http://www.knir.it/nl/evenementen/235-simposio-caravaggisti.html>

Reference:

CONF: Dutch painters in Rome: between Caravaggism and the market (Rome, 28 Apr 17). In: ArtHist.net, Apr 17, 2017 (accessed Jun 25, 2025), <<https://arthist.net/archive/15262>>.