Curatorial Internships at the Harvard University Art Museums

The Curatorial Internship Program at the Harvard University Art Museums (Fogg Art Museum, Arthur M. Sackler Museum and Busch-Reisinger Museum) is designed to broaden the experience of persons embarking on professional and scholarly careers in art history who are considering the museum profession. The intern shares fully in the range of curatorial activities including acquisitions, storage and documentation of the permanent collection, and in answering scholarly inquiries and general correspondence. The intern also undertakes an independent, collections-related project, under the supervision of the curator. The Harvard University Art Museums, along with the Straus Center for Conservation and Technical Studies, are a major center for art historical research and training. Interns participate in the Museums' active exhibition and publication initiatives and a weekly seminar with conservation interns.

Ten-month, academic-year internships are available in the Drawings Department, Fogg Art Museum and the Islamic and Later Indian Art Department, Arthur M. Sackler Museum. The Busch-Reisinger Museum offers a 22-month internship annually, restricted in alternate years to European nationals (2004-2006 Stefan Engelhorn Curatorial Internship is not restricted). Interns will be eligible for the Baird Travel Fellowship upon completion of internship. Baird awards are competitive, based on a proposed project requiring travel for research. The Baird Fellow will return to Harvard within two years to lecture on his/her research results.
