Durning-Lawrence Professor of History of Art
Department of History of Art
University College London

UCL's Department of History of Art is a successful medium-sized department with a high international reputation both for its scholarship and for its teaching at undergraduate and graduate levels. In view of the retirement of Professors David Bindman and Helen Weston later this year, the department is seeking to make three new appointments, from September 2005. One of these appointments will be to the Durning-Lawrence Chair of the History of Art. The other appointments may be made at any level from Lecturer 'A' to Senior Lecturer/Reader, according to the experience and achievements of the successful candidates. We seek to appoint scholars with specialisms in the following areas: British art and culture of the eighteenth and nineteenth century; French art and culture from c. 1700 to c. 1850; twentieth-century or contemporary art in the context of the global impact of modern and/or postmodern art.

The person appointed will be an internationally distinguished scholar, working in either the British or the French field.

Professorial salary is negotiable.

Further particulars (including a personal details form for completion and submission with applications) are available on the UCL History of Art website (<http://www.ucl.ac.uk/art-history/>). Informal enquiries can be made to Dr Tom Gretton, Head of the UCL Department of History of Art (t.gretton@ucl.ac.uk).

Applications (10 copies for UK-based candidates, one copy for overseas candidates), including a curriculum vitae (with publications list), a statement of research interests and plans, the names and contact details of three referees (including at least one referee based outside the applicant's country of residence) and details of current salary, should be addressed to the President and Provost of UCL and sent to the Director of Academic Services, UCL, 5 Gower Street, London WC1E 6BT.

Lecturer, School of Art History
University of St Andrews
£23,643 - £35,883 pa

Currently this department mainly teaches the history of western art from the Middle Ages to the 20th Century and has a 5A rating from the most recent RAE. We are particularly interested in attracting an individual with a specialist interest in the history of architecture. This subject area is one of the School's traditional strengths and is one for which we are well resourced, particularly in the area of British/Scottish architecture.

You will have, or be close to completing, a PhD. You should have an academic background and qualification in a relevant area, experience of teaching Art History and you will have published academic research or be able to demonstrate the potential to do so.

Informal enquiries to Professor Ian Carradice,
