Dada in Debate

Friday 25 Nov. 14.00–19.00 and Saturday 26 Nov. 2005, 10.30–18.30

London, Tate Modern

Dada was one of the most innovative and influential movements of twentieth-century art. It sprang out of counter-cultural activities during the First World War, and manifested itself in a diverse range of practices such as photomontage, assemblage, performance art and readymades to name but a few. Nonsense, nihilism, fierce intellectual paradox and polemic are qualities readily found in Dada texts and manifestoes.

This conference, convened by David Hopkins and Michael White, has been prompted by a major Dada exhibition that opened in Paris in October 2005 and travels to Washington DC and New York in 2006. This landmark show provides the opportunity for a broader re-reading of the subject. Much of the literature on Dada has focussed narrowly on individuals or on the local groups formed in major cities such as Zurich, New York, Berlin and Paris. The aim of this conference is to try and think about Dada beyond the heavily mythologised narratives that surround the local groups and connect Dada to the recent concerns of humanities scholarship such as issues of identity, theories of the avant-garde and mass culture. Relatively neglected areas of research such as metaphysics and ideologies of race are also considered.
