Body and Embodiment in the Netherlands, 1400-1900

Deadline March 17, 2006

Volume 58 (2007) will address the representations and experiences of the body as communicated in Netherlandish art from 1400-1900.

In the past 20 years many disciplines, from philosophy and literary criticism to history, cultural anthropology and cultural studies, have acquired a striking interest in the body. But due to the so-called 'cultural' or 'linguistic' turn in the humanities much of this work has been dominated by mentalist, strongly language-based assumptions. As a critical observer complained, 'There is so much written about the body, but it all focuses on such a recent period. And in so much of it, the body dissolves into language. The body that eats, that works, that dies, that is afraid – that body just isn't there.' More recently, a growing number of studies on the body and embodiment in general has taken this criticism to heart, adopting different approaches. The authors recognize the relevance of language-based perspectives, but point out that these merely provide us with a partial view on the body, while omitting other, no less important ones. Instead of texts and signs it is the performing and understanding body, the body 'that works, eats and is afraid', that is put to the fore.

Taking these recent views as a point of departure this new volume of the Nederlands Kunsthistorisch Jaarboek intends to focus on the performative dimensions of the body as represented in Netherlandish art from the fifteenth to the nineteenth centuries. By relating images of the body, as transmitted through paintings, prints, sculpture or photography, to a cultural history of the body and embodiment in general (including our historical practices of looking, of visual perception), our understanding of these images may considerably be enhanced. Essay topics might address the cultural and visual conventions of dressed and the naked body, specific codes and iconographies of female and male, civilized or uncouth bodies, the representation of sick, dead or dissected bodies, the religious, philosophical and political conventions and meanings of visual embodiment, movement and gesture; and the material history of the artistic production of bodies in different genres.

The NKJ is dedicated to a particular theme each year and publishes essays that reflect the increasing diversity of approaches to the study of Netherlandish art. Contributions to the NKJ (in Dutch, English, German, or French) are limited to a maximum length of 7,500 words, excluding the notes.

The deadline for submission of proposals is March 17, 2006, and the deadline for the completed articles is November 17, 2006. Final decisions on the acceptance of any paper will be made by the editorial board following receipt of the complete text.

Proposals for papers, in the form of a 200-word abstract, should be sent to prof. dr. Herman Roodenburg (herman.roodenburg@meertens.knaw.nl) or to dr. Ann-Sophie Lehmann (Ann-Sophie.Lehmann@let.uu.nl).
