Power and Image in Early Modern Europe

Graduate Student Conference

Casa Italiana Zerilli-Marimò

New York University

April, 6-8th 2006

Guy Debord has argued that "the spectacle inherits all the weaknesses of the Western project which undertook to comprehend activity in terms of seeing." In his 1967 study of the role of image and spectacle in modern societies, The Society of the Spectacle, Debord anticipated much of the cultural debate that has predominated in the late twentieth century. Does the growth of the power of image mirror the development of modern societies, as Debord maintains, or, alternatively, is the image capable of autonomy from social and economic influences? This conference re-examines the exchange between power and image in the context of Early Modern Europe. How have patrons, artists, and consumers acted upon and reacted to the image? How do some images achieve a privileged and even sacred status, while others become figures of the negative and the "Other"? If awareness of the power of image in visual and literary culture is tied to self-consciousness and "modernity," how have artists explored the conflict between representation and essence? Seeing and seeming?

The conference will take place on April 7-8, 2006, at the NYU Casa Italiana Zerilli-Marimò. See program.

Deanna Shemek, professor of Italian and Comparative Literature at Cowell College, University of California, Santa Cruz.
