What does it mean for a work of art to be "authentic"? The fascinating philosophical and practical issues that arise in answering that question sometimes result in legal disputes, and developments in contemporary art have made these issues even more complex. For example, traditional notions of authenticity may be strained when the artist has no direct hand in the production of an artwork, or when the work is composed of everyday objects or uses nontraditional media. In this program, leading scholars, experts and practitioners will explore what happens when the authenticity of art is challenged. Recent cases involving the work of Warhol, Pollock, Calder and others will be discussed.
