

Toys as Material and Visual Culture (CAA 2011)

Amy Ogata

Toys as (Material and Visual) Culture Design Studies Forum Short Session,
College Art Association Annual Meeting, New York, 2011 Chair: Amy F. Ogata,
Bard Graduate Center:

Decorative Arts, Design History, Material Culture As the material embodiment of attitudes about play and work, as well as experimental aesthetics, national and personal identity, toys are a productive site for exploring the social and cultural implications of design, and material and visual culture. Marking the twenty-fifth anniversary of Brian Sutton-Smith's influential book Toys as Culture, this session will explore how toys (broadly defined) constitute a unique aspect of historical and contemporary human culture. In addition to educators and psychologists concerned with play, writers as diverse as Roland Barthes, Johan Huizinga, Gary Cross, and Daniel Tiffany have explored the implications of toys. This session invites scholars and designers in all fields to play with toys. Antique toys, handmade toys, artists' toys, automata, mass-produced objects, designer toys, collectibles, toy advertising and graphics, websites and digital toys, and the representation and practice of toy culture are all possible areas of inquiry. Papers might address aesthetics, materials, production, use and disposal, in addition to questions about the role of pedagogy, fantasy, historical memory, and globalization.
