Workshop "Interrupted Architectures: Unfinished Medieval Buildings between Failure and 'Open Work' (11th-14th century)"

Scientific organization: Tanja Michalsky and Margherita Tabanelli

In recent years the concept of the 'Unfinished' in contemporary architecture has undergone a significant critical development. From a theoretic standpoint, the Unfinished is mainly associated with Umberto Eco's concept of 'Open work', which stresses the aspects of fluidity and the openness of contemporary works of art and the arduousness of circumscribing a creative process.

At the same time, attention to unfinished works has increased in Italy as a reaction to the huge number of unfinished and abandoned public buildings that dot the territory. In these contexts, the tendency has been mainly to present the phenomenon as typical of the contemporary age.

The history of medieval architecture is, however, studded with episodes of abandonment of construction sites, often among the most daring projects. Grounds and modalities of building interruptions represent an interesting research field, but an unfinished building site also offers a sort of still image of its construction process, allowing information to be gathered on building techniques and practices.

This workshop aims to draw attention to the unfinished works of high and late Middle Ages in Europe from the points of view of disciplines such as the history of art and architecture, archaeology, the history of restoration, and other related historical disciplines.
