Fakes and forgeries are items that characterized the art sector since the birth of the art market. Artwork copies, fakes and forgeries (almost) freely circulate in the art market and affect the way price is formed, the way the discourse on artists takes place, and the way art market institutions and agents choose their strategies. This effect consists in an increase of the uncertainty about the authenticity value of the artworks, a value which is part of the cultural value, that in turn affects the artworks' economic value.

This makes the existence of fakes an important issue, which should be analysed with an interdisciplinary view. Art market scholars, including economists, art historians, sociologists, management and marketing scholars, historians, among the others, analysed the influence of fakes in the market under different points of view, but the need to link together these views in a holistic analysis of the issue of fakes in the art market is now necessary.

This workshop wants to be a way to start this process of creation of an interdisciplinary framework of analysis of the art market fakes, welcoming approaches and arguments of different academic fields, so as to enucleate the differences and similarities in the approaches used.

The workshop will consist of the intervention of a series of invited speakers from international renewed universities, together with 3 sessions for contributed works by scholars and researchers from national and international research institutions. The workshop will also host the presentation of the multimedia database on fakes curated by Professors Donatella Biagi Maino and Giuseppe

Maino, that will be followed by a roundtable moderated by Professor Donatella Biagi Maino where invited experts, practitioners and scholars will highlight the policies adopted and to be adopted in researching the fakes in the art market.

Topics of the workshop (among the others):

- Economic impact of fakes' discovery
- Historical role of fakes in the art world
- Art fakes and art crime
- Ambiguity surrounding the definition of "fakes" in the art market
- Case studies of fakes and forgeries in the art market
- (Large-scale) empirical evidence the influence of fakes in art market figures
