ARTIS ON N.11 (2021) | EXCESS AND INSUFFICIENCY OF VIDEO. PRESENT ISSUES

Artis on n. 11 (2021) | Excess and insufficiency of video

The Institute of Art History at the School of Arts and Humanities at the University of Lisbon will publish the 11h issue of the ARTis ON journal. Titled Excess and Insufficiency of video. Present issues, it will examine the role the latter plays in current art practices.

Editor: Pedro Lapa

The excess defined by the use of video in the early 2000's has not granted any unity whatsoever to the medium, the latter scattered into issues such as the rejection of high-tech and the employment of the obsolete, memory, and the archive, manipulated found footage, or the relationship between documentary and fiction. Video has become a privileged medium, and its critical deployment in diverse cultural practices has retrieved the structuring insufficiency of a modern-world test agent.

Throughout 2010's we have witnessed a transformation, as video became integrated into heterogenous sets and assemblages. Present-day installations are comprised of objects, documents, images, elements which keep their independence and relate to one another in particular, even obscure ways. Selecting these elements within the whole produces conflicts and diverse epistemologies and new ontologies. It is at the heart of such heterogeneity that video finds a place among other agents (Pierre Huyghe, Jenna Sutela, Laure Prouvost, Slavs and Tatars, Neïl Beloufa, Pedro Barateiro). Its agencying, thus, is the product of a differentiated set, its effectivity distributed over this ontologically heterogenous field. As there is some component of each element/actant disconnected from the whole of the installation, video retains an efficacy of its own which is susceptible of further iteration in new contexts in the most radical instances. As such, it participates in a non-totalizable aggregate, although it connects with other agents. Such porosity can become the actual manifestation of its insufficiency.

On the other hand, in some videos by other artists (Ed Atkins, Cécile B. Evans, Hito Steyerl, Ryan Trecartin, Gabriel Abrantes, Ursula Biemann, Clemens von Wedemeyer, Alexandre Estrela, Otolith Group), projections assume an exclusive or central role. They oscillate between 8K CGI (computer generated image) or ever-recycled, internet-bound poor images; however, it is the presence of digital image and its social, political, or perceptive practices, as well as its offs and its absorption of the world, that manifest an excess which overlaps a constitutive absence. It is as though the insufficiency of the digital contributed to its continuous regeneration before it substituted things, beings, and materialities in an infinitely circulation that became the language of contemporaneity, which is dangerously defined by the logic of capital. These artists' enquiring of the excess is a critical one, removed from a supposed self-sufficiency. Within the overwhelming hegemony of the digital, the possibilities of non-identity are looked at.

This ARTis ON issue seeks to reflect on matters raised by current video practices and their subsequent considerations in art history - less its antecedents or the history of neo-vanguards than the most recent productions.

The submitting articles must articulate the aforementioned topics or others considered relevant within the scope of the issue. We invite art historians, art critics, curators, artists, and those interested to submit their articles until 30 May 2021, following the journal's guidelines:
