Aka Pacha - Contemporary Art in las Américas

In Aymara, Aka Pacha describes a concept of time that does not conceive time as linear and continuous, but rather comprehends past and future from the present (Cusicanqui 2010: 54-55). Aka Pacha's understanding of the present offers a starting point from which art can be situated in an alternative framework of space and time. At the same time, the parameters of perception change out of this contemporaneous network, which is why aesthetic-political processes have to be reconsidered. Situating history in the present and not considering it as a narrative fixed in the past also leads to a dynamic interpretation in the sense of Homi Bhabha (Bhabha 2011). A look at current discourses and practices of decolonization also shows that political and artistic spaces of action overlap, not only in terms of time, but space. This is also visible in current protest movements in the Américas, where for example, indigenous, queer and feminist activists are calling for a fundamental reformation of persisting patriarchal and (neo)colonial social structures. They also criticize social conditions and grievances as well as profit-oriented interventions in natural habitats. Against this background, the workshop will critically examine artistic works produced in the context of the Américas from an Aka Pacha, contemporary perspective. The aim is to achieve a multi-perspectival understanding of space and time, which will make current discourses and movements visible and methodologically fruitful for a transcultural art history. Some of the guiding questions for this workshop are: how do aesthetic/artistic tendencies situated in the Américas but practiced globally be described from a 'permanent present'? How can alternative concepts of time be epistemically made fruitful for a transcultural art historiography? What aesthetic strategies, for example, in the fields of media, technology and communication, are used to address (temporal) simultaneity in artworks? And what are the consequences for the reception of art in and outside of the Américas?
