A woman's view of Dalmatian artistic heritage through travel narratives from the eighteenth to the twentieth centuries.

A call for papers for an international scientific meeting / round table organized as part of a week of events in scholarship and research DISCOVERING DALMATIA IX.

How to explore a specifically female view of the artistic heritage of Dalmatia through books, documents (letters, manuscripts, diaries, drawings) and works of art from the eighteenth to the twentieth centuries?

The beginning of the answer to this question was made in the creation of a chronogeographic database of "grand tourism" in Dalmatia (<http://grandtourdalmatia.org/chrono-geographical-database/mapping-history/>), as part of the CSF Grand Tour Dalmatia project (UIP-2013-11-7091, 2014-17), through which numerous travelogues of Dalmatia in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries were collected and classified. The very scope of women's travel writing mapped by the database indicates that these are very relevant materials for further collection and research across a wider time span, and in response, the creation of a special subcategory of women's travel writing in the database is proposed. The significance of women's travel narratives in this region – geographically located on the border of East and West, and where Christian and Islamic cultures touched and created a rich artistic heritage – can thus become the focus of interdisciplinary travel writing research for the first time.

We approach the travelogue as a genre for collecting and conveying information about other cultures, testing it as a genre of female emancipation, and exploring the scope of female expertise in this field. Focusing on trips to Dalmatia (but not exclusively so), this gathering will consider the specificity of women's views of the artistic heritage of Dalmatia through collected case studies. But we are also interested in how travel served women: the ways in which women established themselves as experienced travellers, respected authors, and disciplinary experts from the eighteenth century, during a period when their rights were seriously challenged.

Although we are primarily interested in Dalmatian travel writing by women, and the evolution of Dalmatian artistic heritage in their works, the meeting is open to all those who, through their research, can contribute to the understanding of women's transfer of knowledge through travel. Therefore, an interdisciplinary circle of scholars are invited to participate in this meeting in order to open this topic together and explore the innovation and erudition of women's narratives.

We invite professionals of various backgrounds, whose research addresses these topics to send a 250-word abstract and a short CV to: discoveringdalmatia@gmail.com.
