The Rome Drawings of Charles Percier and their Afterlife.

Charles Percier (1764–1838) was one of the most influential architects and architectural theorists in France in the decades before and after 1800.

In addition to his formative role as Napoleon's architect, together with Pierre François Léonard Fontaine, his influence lies above all in his teaching activities, from which pupils such as J. Hittorf, P. Letarouilly and A. de Montferrand emerged.

As in the case of many other European architects of the multifaceted 19th century, his personal experience of art and architecture in Italy was fundamental to his work. Honoured with the grand prix of the Académie royale d'Architecture, Percier stayed in Rome from 1786 to 1791, studying important architectural monuments there and in the surrounding area. He used his return journey on foot to Paris to familiarise himself with the architecture of central and northern Italy. During this time, he created a total of around 2000 drawings, a wide-ranging documentation that reflects the influence of new compositional methods and served both for his own training and as model material, and as such fulfilled a didactic function.

This largely unpublished material clearly reveals Percier's comprehensive view, which encompasses architecture, sculpture, ornament and gardens and spans a broad chronological horizon from antiquity to contemporary art at his time. These experiences flowed into an architectural theory that he anchored primarily in Roman palace construction. The contributions to the conference will shed light on various aspects of his oeuvre, primarily on the basis of drawings from his Roman period.

Finally, other contributions will also call attention to Percier's European significance, which is also reflected in projects in the Polish lands and, not least, in the fact that the visual appearance of the young kingdom in Bavaria was placed in the hands of Napoleon's architect.

The conference is part of a larger programme of work on the publication of Percier's drawings made in Italy, most of which are in the Institut de France. The volumes Emilia e Romagna (2016) and Toscana, Umbria e Marche (2021) have already been published in the series I disegni di Charles Percier.
