In Walter Benjamin's Theses on the Philosophy of History, the phrase "materialistic historiography" appears as the negation of traditional historicism's "causal nexus" and the name of Benjamin's overall problematique of writing history—historiography—as the production of memory traces, remnants, and chains. The adjective "materialistic" conjures a technicity of perceptual and mnemonic programs, installed prior to the history-grapher's aggressive interruption, dislocation, and reinscription of the genealogical diagram, an effort of marking and scripting which might—just possibly, and only weakly messianically—set up possible frameworks for possible futures.

Perspectives in Architecture and Urbanism invites explorations of the examples and methods of materialistic historiography which, through close readings of objects and their conditions of possibility, move beyond the merely representational and mimetic conception of buildings, user identities, and professed politics. We recognize that while the overtaking of critical theory by so-called cultural studies in the 1990s rejuvenated architecture and urbanism's sense of social urgency, the actual result of neopragmatism, identity politics, extraction critique, and new historicism was the return to old humanist motifs of the everyday, the body, the determinant context, and the general ignoring of the actual materialistic basis of the social imaginary already inscribed but undetectable to these methods.

For upcoming issues of Perspectives in Architecture and Urbanism, we imagine writings conceived and produced in the frame of "materialistic historiography." We welcome the possibility of hybrid constructions and models of theory and practice in which, for example, a symptomatic reading of an architectural project confronts not just the fact but the forms of climate change. Where a study of the movements of migration ponders the issue of research in an archive comprising only traces of things left behind. We hope for multiple "allo-history-graphics"—other iterations of historical inscription—that analyze or take issue with our formulation of the current problematic; that expand other ways of thinking about the present practice of history.

How to submit:

We invite all those interested to submit materials to the Editorial Office at paujournal@outlook.com using as subject line:

CFP Historiography AUTHOR'S SURNAME abstract
(e.g., CFP Historiography HAYS abstract)

Submissions should contain:

- Title
