Postcolonial Hauntologies: Art in the Presence – Absence of the Past.

Marked by the publication of Derrida's Specters of Marx in 1994, the spectral turn saw the spectre as a conceptual signifier of the "invisible visible" or not-fully-realised presence that claims space. The spectre can signify a form of traumatic presence that continues to haunt individuals and societies that have not confronted their troubled pasts. So, Nicholas Abraham's term "phantom" is linked to the transgenerational transmission of shame and guilt. In a broader sense, legacies of violence can persist in affected societies, manifesting in various forms and carrying the threat of re-emergence. In postcolonial contexts, the haunting legacies may include traumas resulting from centuries of racial othering or the delayed consequences of environmental violence.

Art can offer a space for reflection, reconnection, and resistance. Contemporary artists explore the potentialities of their media – indexical, performative, or time-based while touching upon traces and resonances of past and ongoing violence. Museums and institutions face the challenge of dealing with ruptures and continuity within postcolonial structures.

This symposium, held jointly at the University of Amsterdam (Netherlands) and Concordia University (Canada), brings together artists, art historians, curators and early-career researchers from diverse regions to discuss the following questions: How do artists use their media to make the invisible visible or actualize spectral traces? What kinds of temporalities do they create when engaging with haunting legacies? In what ways can museums challenge and transform postcolonial legacies? How do artistic and curatorial methods address the absence in archives and reimagine archival practices? How can engaging with postcolonial hauntologies help us build cross-border solidarities?
