The Art History of Art Therapy

The term ‘art therapy’ was coined in mid-twentieth century Europe, but its history reaches back into the nineteenth century. Its development as a clinical practice was as diverse as it was discontinuous: in different contexts, art therapy could serve as a means of healing and transformation, or as a tool of discipline and pathologization. Over the course of the twentieth century, the methods and institutions of art therapy have spread globally, intersecting with developments in modern aesthetics and art history in ways that remain largely unexplored.

This interdisciplinary workshop brings together scholars in the history of art and the history of the ‘psy’ sciences to examine the historical practices of art therapy and their relation to art history and art education. Under what circumstances have the production and reception of artworks been deemed therapeutic, and for whom? How has the diagnostic value of art been established in clinical and education settings? What consequences did this have for patients? And how has art therapy developed also in informal, self-guided, or anti-institutional contexts?

By placing focus on the ‘art history of art therapy’, we aim to illuminate how non-normative modes of perceiving and experiencing the world—particularly those historically excluded from mainstream art historiography—have shaped modern ideas of creativity, embodiment, and perception. It is equally crucial to recognize when and how these histories were enabled by coercive and exploitative structures. The workshop particularly emphasizes the historical agency of disabled and neurodiverse individuals and communities in the elaboration of aesthetic theories and practices.
