Sixth Edition of AIWAC (Annual International Women in the Arts Conference): Reframing methodologies. Women Artists in Italy from 1607 to the Italian Unification.

Following the two exhibitions “Roma Pittrice. Artiste al lavoro tra XVI e XIX secolo” (Rome, Palazzo Braschi, 25/10/2024 - 04/05/2025) and “Donne nella Napoli spagnola. Un altro Seicento” (Naples, Le Gallerie d'Italia – 20/11/ 2025 – 22/3/2026), this conference seeks to foster critical reflections on methodologies for the study of women artists. More than fifty years after Linda Nochlin’s seminal question, “Why have there been no great women artists?”, we aim to reassess and critically examine the current state of scholarship on women and gender in the arts.

We invite scholars to present papers addressing any aspect of women artists and their participation in cultural discourses from the early modern to the modern period. The goal is to reconsider and reframe methodological approaches within the discipline. While the field has made significant advances, it has also perpetuated certain narratives and myths that have shaped—at times uncritically—the rhetoric of feminist art history. This conference aims to interrogate these assumptions and to reassess the historiographical and philological foundations of the field.

The year 1607 marks a significant turning point: the Accademia di San Luca in Rome opened its doors to women for the first time, contributing to the professionalization of women artists. In the decades that followed, other Italian cities adopted similar practices. Alongside academies, artistic training was also provided through workshops, which functioned as de facto private academies.

Although only a limited number of women were admitted to official institutions—such as the Accademia di San Luca, where women were documented as members from 1607, albeit excluded from life drawing and governance—many women accessed professional training through alternative structures. These included art schools founded by women artists themselves, such as Elisabetta Sirani’s school in Bologna and Virginia da Vezzo’s in Paris. Artemisia Gentileschi likewise maintained a workshop in Naples, where she trained her daughter Prudentia as well as several male artists.

Suggested topics include, but are not limited to:

- Methodological approaches to the study of women artists (past, present, and future)
- Revisiting canonical narratives and persistent myths in feminist art history
- Archival, philological, and historiographical challenges in reconstructing women’s artistic production
- Women artists and artistic training: academies, workshops, and alternative pedagogies
- Professional networks, patronage, and mobility (local, national, and transnational)

- Women artists as teachers, workshop leaders, and agents of artistic transmission
- The role of institutions (academies, courts, convents) in shaping women's artistic careers
- Gendered access to artistic genres (portraiture, history painting, still life, etc.)
- Women artists and the art market
- Self-representation, authorship, and artistic identity
- Women artists in relation to family workshops and dynastic practices
- Cross-cultural exchanges and the presence of Italian women artists abroad or expatriate women artists in Italy.
- The reception and historiography of women artists from the 17th to the 19th century
- Rethinking periodization: from early modern to modern frameworks
- Digital humanities and new tools for researching women artists
