Thijs Weststeijn

PhD candidate in Art History, University of Amsterdam

Salary indication: €2,083 to €2,664 gross per month

The Amsterdam Centre of Cultural Heritage and Identity (ACHI) of the Faculty of Humanities is looking for a PhD candidate in Art History as part of the project The Chinese Impact: Images and Ideas of China in the Dutch Golden Age (NWO-Vidi). This project explores the mutual perceptions that resulted from the cultural exchange between China and the Low Countries (Northern and Southern Netherlands) in the seventeenth century.

Project description

During the first period of intensive contacts between China and Europe, Dutch traders were the main importers of Chinese mass-produced goods. Amsterdam and Antwerp were central nodes in the transfer of information, making China better known to a wide European public through publications, translations, and illustrations. This lively exchange ensured that only in the Netherlands, Chinese-style ceramics became available to all layers of society; moreover, the Low Countries were at the forefront of the intellectual reaction to China, which resulted in the first European translation of the writings of Confucius (in Dutch). The research program The Chinese Impact includes two PhD projects, in cultural history and art history, to explore written and visual images of China.

The PhD candidate in Art History will study a selection of engravings, paintings, and works of applied art. The research explores relevant artistic themes, styles, and the history of collecting. The focus is on artistic production in the Low Countries; in addition, the analysis may also involve Chinese ceramics made for the European market.

Requirements

- The applicant must have a completed MA degree in a relevant field, preferably European or Asian art history, before the start date of the fellowship;

- The applicant's CV illustrates familiarity with the analysis of Early Modern art, preferably complemented by demonstrable interest in the Low Countries or China;
- The applicant has an excellent command of English in reading, writing, and speaking. A good reading competence in Dutch is an additional plus.
