

Exhibiting the Renaissance (Kunsttexte 2015)

Deadline: Oct 31, 2014

Angela Dressen

Exhibiting art objects has certainly increased over the past decades. There are more and more large scale exhibitions, some of which able to attract masses of people. What is the driving force behind this multitude of exhibitions? Does Renaissance, once a classical topic, still play a significant role? In order to understand the outreach of the Renaissance in public view, we would like to have insides on how museums are dealing with their Renaissance departments. A museum is seldom build of objects just of one single period, but collections and their curators are competing over permanent exhibition space and temporary exhibitions.

We would like to invite papers with reflections on the value of Renaissance objects in the perception of museum strategies, competing collections, possibilities of exhibition, etc. The value and perception of the collection might vary because the museum strategy values the Renaissance highly, because the curator is a successful promoter, because the civic surroundings are especially open to Renaissance topics, because the permanent collection already contains widely known Renaissance objects, or because the exhibition projects focus on topics which attract a mass of people.

A thematic issue on "Exhibiting the Renaissance" is projected with the open access online journal Kunsttexte (www.kunsttexte.de) for the first half of 2015. We invite papers (in German, English, French, Italian, Spanish) for a deadline in October 2014. Please feel free to contact the editors of the section Renaissance with any questions.

Send your proposals to both editors of Kunsttexte (Sektion Renaissance)

Angela Dressen (adressen@itatti.harvard.edu)

Susanne Gramatzki (gramatz@uni-wuppertal.de).

Reference:

CFP: Exhibiting the Renaissance (Kunsttexte 2015). In: ArtHist.net, Apr 17, 2014 (accessed Feb 9, 2026), <<https://arthist.net/archive/7482>>.