"Art History and its Audiences"

Session at the 2015 Midwest Art History Society Annual Conference

Minneapolis and St. Paul, MN

Session Chair: Amy K. Hamlin, St. Catherine University (akhamlin@stkate.edu)

Who have art history's audiences been? Who are they now? Who might they be? More than an invitation to idle thought experiments, these questions raise concerns of urgent public interest, as support for the humanities appears to be eroding in a perfect storm of economic, political, and technological shifts. If art history is a paradigmatic humanities discipline, then there is much at stake and much to act on. Take for example the stagnant and declining enrollments in college and university art history programs, or the recent decision by several U.S. museums, including the Los Angeles County Museum of Art, to join Snapchat in a bid to reach younger audiences. What are our opportunities and challenges, resources and obstacles? What is potentially lost or gained in efforts to recruit new audiences? Are the goals of diversification and expansion paramount, or are there other objectives to prioritize? What might be learned from past experiences to think through future possibilities? This aspirational session invites papers that respond to any one of these questions in theory and/or in practice and with an eye to imagining a more sustainable future for our discipline. Proposals might include concrete or anecdotal evidence that focuses on a single audience or multiple audiences that – like a Venn diagram – overlap in meaningful and productive ways.
